With his temporary ban on vaping product sales set to end next week, Gov. Charlie Baker said he hoped public health officials adopt a new set of vaping rules, Gov. Charlie Baker said. This week, he expressed some surprise that other states did not follow Massachusetts' lead amid an outbreak of vaping-related illnesses.

After Baker spoke Thursday at the Pri-Med East conference, medical student Dominic Domino from the UMass Medical School in Worcester thanked the governor for his "fantastic" work to address vaping and said it was widely appreciated by the medical community. The audience gave the governor a hearty round of applause.

"I really appreciate your bringing this one up," Baker said. "I've talked a lot about the amount of grief for this, and we've been in a different place than a lot of other places around the country, which I actually don't understand. I think we're in the wrong place."

The illnesses, which have been blamed for three deaths in Massachusetts, prompted the Baker administration in September to institute an emergency ban on vaping product sales in the state. That ban, challenged and upheld in court, was set to lift Dec. 24 but Baker announced last week that it instead would expire Dec. 11 as new vaping regulations are put into place by the state Public Health Council.

Though other states have banned the sale of flavored vaping products, Massachusetts went further to ban all vaping products, though that ban was weakened by the courts as it related to medical marijuana products. Baker said Thursday morning that he doesn't get why other states adopted the Massachusetts model.

"I continue to not understand why that hasn't been pursued more at either the federal level or in other states," he said. "I mean, there's a story on the front page of the Boston Globe today that says what we've done in Massachusetts is driving a lot of the sales of these products into other states around us and I don't see how that is good for anybody."

The governor told the Pri-Med conference that he asked Health and Services Secretary Marylou Sudders to bring in a group of doctors to talk about the rash of illnesses and injuries in September. Massachusetts has reported 90 probable or confirmed cases of vaping-related illnesses.

"They all basically said the same thing, which is that vaping, by itself, has risks associated with it that are not fully understood," he said

operating on a pretty solid foundation of input, guidance and exp from a lot of the folks here in the commonwealth who just said th really big issues with this just generally that aren't appreciated or and may not be for a while, which is why we made the decision v

Domino told Baker that, "as a clinician, it was brave to do what yc and ... it took guts to do what you did."

On Thursday night, the Department of Public Health posted data indicating that six patients with probable cases of vaping-associ& injury reported vaping THC, the psychoactive component of mari having purchased the THC at a licensed Massachusetts marijuana Another 22 patients, including 10 confirmed cases, reported vapir not purchased at a licensed retailer.

DPH said it cannot make "specific claims about the role of any inc product" and that it cannot independently verify the products and that patients report in interviews with public health officials.

On Friday morning, the Supreme Judicial Court announced that i all action in a challenge to Baker's ban -- and has indefinitely pos oral arguments scheduled for Monday -- because "the defendants the emergency regulations that are at issue in this case will be res and the emergency declared by the Governor will be terminated, the Commissioner's emergency order," if the Public Health Counc the new regulations on Wednesday, as is expected.
